A series of short stories about Salih's paradigmatic Sudanese village of Wad Hamid, with a (far from exclusive) focus on three generations of exceptional/semi-magical patriarchs, including the eponymous, as a metaphor for the challenges of Sudan/the Arabic world more generally to grapple with the conflicts of modernity. I liked this, I did not like it quite as much as the sublime Season of Migration to the North and the nearly equally fabulous Wedding of Zein. It's structurally a bit more complex than either of those, which in practice I thought got in the way of Salih's beautiful prose and profound moral grasp. Library, but I probably wouldn't keep it not because it's not good, it is good, but the other two are better and make a cleaner case for Salih's genius.
