Maybe you've heard a tale about twelve princesses who danced their shoes to pieces. That was only part of our story.

Talya would tell you how dark and frightening the cursed forest and enchanted lake were. Vira would be too busy looking after us all to tell you many details, while Mina would try to give you every fact and figure (even though magic is rarely so logical). Each of my sisters would tell the story differently.

And Dastan—he'd write a ballad. Or maybe a love song.

As for me, I'm the storyteller, so I'm giving you my version. It's about my sisters and me, our father, twelve princes and a cursed country—about a series of misguided champions, one even more misguided Fairy Godmother, and a great deal of dancing. It's about twelve trapped princesses who decided to take control of their story.

I'm Lyra, the ninth princess, and this is how I tell the tale.

Mary says

It is a good book. It is a little hard to get into at the beginning, but I think it is worth the read. It jumps right into the story with very little build-up. I loved how many of the characters poked fun at typical fairytale elements. (received free through Goodreads First Reads)

R.A. Gates says

A wonderful retelling of The Twelve Dancing Princesses. The sisters meet 12 cursed princes and do their best to break the spell, without letting anybody else in the castle know what they're up to. The author does a delightful job of weaving humor and intrigue into the story, making it almost impossible to put the book down before it's finished.
