An interesting read with a moral tale to tell - 3.5*

I liked the ideas behind the book. It isn't the most interesting book (as an adult) but I think the children in my class would really enjoy re-enacting the 'grrrrr'!

It would be useful for PSHE or just as an end of the day story. There's definitely a number of book talk questions that would arise from this book.

Fred is a three-peat champion of the Best Bear in the woods contest, but he thinks he doesn't need anyone, as long as he has his trophies and ribbons, but when a new challenger comes along, and Fred loses his award winning GRRRRR, he discovers that he does need friends to help him find it, to retain his championship.

Fred is the three-year champion of the Best Bear in the Wood Contest. He is great at fishing, hula-hooping, scaring humans and especially growling. He's got the loudest GRRRRR of all.

My children loved it!

This is a great story about friendship, but can be used for a storytime about bears or sports. The text rhymes. It's very nearly too long for a preschool storytime, but worked for a group of four year olds I did today.

Fred has a lot of impressive talents, but the best talent of all is that his grrrrr is the loudest of all. This means that he spends a lot of time on his own getting ready to compete, but he doesn't need friends when he's surrounded by all of his trophies and awards. When a new bear comes to try to win Fred's usual trophy and Fred wakes up one morning with no grrrrr, Fred is worried that this could be the end of his reputation as the bear with the best grrrrr. Soon new friends help Fred to find his roar and to find out what happened to Fred's most prized attribute. Fred and others learn that having good friendships is more important than winning prizes.

The book is written in a nice rhyme that makes it easy to read aloud. The illustrations are bright and colorful, and even though Fred isn't always the most admirable character, he is always lovable. The ending is sweet, with both Fred and the villain of the story discovering that they want and need the same things to be happy. It isn't clear why all of the animals decide to suddenly be friends with Fred when he hadn't made any time to be nice previously, but they come together to support him and it makes a nice ending that readers of all ages will enjoy. While most children aren't in the kind of position where they choose between friends and awards, the power of friendship is still clearly and sweetly portrayed in this charming picture book.
