An Illicit Indiscretion Bronwyn Scott

London, 1835

Dashiell Steen, heir to the Earl of Heathridge, is tired of boring dinner parties and matchmaking mamas. He craves one final adventure before he's forced to settle down—and finds it with a vivacious beauty escaping from a manor window! Elisabeth Becket's intelligence and rebellious sprit excite both his mind and his body, stirring a mutual attraction that neither can resist. But will their illicit encounter last when she discovers Dashiell is the unwanted suitor she was trying to escape?

Short but enjoyable. 3.5?

Dashiell is an Earl's heir, bored with life and looking for anything to shake up his staid, conventional lifestyle. So when he Elisabeth falls on him after climbing out of her window, he's intrigued. Even more so when he accompanies her to an observatory where he witnesses her passion for astronomy, for life and for him. This was a pretty cute story, with a plucky heroine and a sincere hero. I wasn't 100% sold on the accuracy of Elisabeth taking off for two nights and absolutely no one learning of her "ruination" but somewhat easy enough to overlook. I also kind of wish there'd been a bit more of a drawn out confrontation with Elisabeth's parents and in which Dashiell confesses his love. This is a worthwhile read for sure.

From the introduction written by Bronwyn Scott for 'An Illicit Indiscretion': "It's a Christmas story in that it's a tale of the things we associate with the season; hope and faith and love. Elisabeth gambles everything on her faith that the comet will be there and that her freedom is worth fighting for. Dashiell takes the biggest leap of faith of all in his search for love.

"Their story is set around the 1835 return of Halley's Comet..."

I really enjoyed this novella and highly recommend it.
