Matti says

Mist de gelijkaardige hoogtepunten als uit het eerste nummer, blijft een speciale rit doorheen de geschiedenis van de X-Men.

Patrick says

Stunning.

I love what Piskor is doing for the history of the X-Men.

C. Varn says

Fun

Piskor continues to write a coherent narrative from the silver age X-men that reconciles it with the Claremont period. There are more than a few retroactive continuity changes to make this work but it is highly enjoyable and distills decades of comics in a little over 80 pages.

So apperently there's going to be two more sets of two Grand Design comics (that's a really obtuse way of saying it but whatever), and I can't wait for them. The production value is so great, and I like the retelling of the X-Men universe. I wouldn't want this to take over, of course, but it's cool to just have an alternate version that's been laid out in an easy way to follow. I think the Phoenix Saga may be in the next set too, so hopefully they come out soon (originally it was December of this year but apperently Marvel may move it up? Idk, I'll wait if moving it will affect quality tbh).

I didn't enjoy this one nearly as much as the first one. It felt really convoluted and confusing. Maybe that was because it took me too many reading sessions to get finished with it so I lost momentum. I'll definitely get the next one regardless.

The spark from the first issue has diminished slightly, not completely but there is something lacking in this second part. Nonetheless I'm so happy this is a thing, each panel is completely fantastic! The main downfall of this series is at times, because it is so jam packed, it can be a tad difficult to follow, with so much happening so quickly. However, this comic is a treat for all and everybody should experience it.

I can not think Ed Piskor enough for bringing this into reality. This may be one of the greatest things in comics history to me.
