Abhijeet says

A charming and delightful collection of short stories set in and around the city of Dehra among the foothills of the himalayas. The time period feels like the mid 1980s, before the small towns of India were transformed (in both good and bad ways) in the mid 1990s. It's been close to two decades since I last read this book and I still enjoyed it immensely all over again, which is surprising for two reasons - the protagonists are all children and the world these stories are set in also doesn't exist anymore (except in the memories and imagination of the author). I think that despite these apparent drawbacks, there is a universality to the themes and emotions the stories touch upon, giving them a timeless quality.

Ankan Paul says

Innocent and charming! Each time I long to dive back into my childhood, I resort to Ruskin Bond. His understanding of children's emotions, their feelings, their joy and pride, their friendship and tiny trifles, their sorrow and anger, is unparalleled. Every time I am outside - traveling on a bus, or just walking by the roadside, I try to find the another Koki, Suraj, Ranji or Bhim, and desperately wish to delve back into colorful memories of my own childhood rephrased by Bond. In this book, bond paints the moments of childhood tales, knits them with love and compassion, and presents them with simplicity and generosity. Set in the town of Dehra, in the foothills of the Himalayas, this book is an enriching experience for children and adults alike. A must read!
