Intellectuals Don't Need God and Other Modern Myths: Building Bridges to Faith Through Apologetics Alister E. McGrath

Intellectuals Don't Need God is for people who are not convinced by the arguments of classical, rationalistic apologetics, for people who feel that Christianity must have a broader appeal that to reason alone if it is to be persuasive to non-Christians. Alister McGrath shows convincingly that reason is only one of many possible points of contact between the non-Christian and the gospel. In today's world, nonrational concerns -- such as a sense that life lacks focus, an unconscious fear of death, a deep sense of longing for something unknown we don't have but know we need -- are much more effective points of contact for apologetics. In this book, Dr. McGrath (who is both a theologian and a scientist with a Ph.D. in microbiology) combines the clarity of a brilliant scientific mind with a deep commitment to Christ and to reaching non-Christians. Intellectuals Don't Need God is for anyone who has questions about the validity of Christianity as well as for students, pastors, and lay leaders. Anyone who works with students and young people especially needs to read this book. As McGrath says, "apologetics is not about winning arguments -- it is about bringing people to Christ."

Nifty

April Cardinal says

I read this for apologetics class and I loved it. It is a collection of essays. I've read it again at least 2 other times. Good thoughts, good writing.

Anne says

Fantastic book, especially for those who think Christianity and logic do not go hand in hand.

Laurie says

Dense, but important. It took me a while to get through because I had to re-read sentences or even paragraphs, but it was very helpful to me in defining my personal theology as well as in learning ways to share my faith with others.
